Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an RF (radio frequency) amplifier circuit used in an RF transmission system. 2. Description of the Related Art In recent years, a rapid increase in amount of information transmitted by a radio communication system has been accompanied by a demand for expansion of a communication capacity.

In addition, there is a demand for an increase in the degree of integration of a semiconductor IC chip used in a radio communication system. Thus, there has been a tendency for reduction of the distance between devices mounted on a chip and an increase in the capacitance of wiring. In a system where a high-frequency signal of several GHz or over is subjected to amplification in the microwave band, for example, the capacitance of wiring amounts to about one fourth of the chip size. Therefore, as compared with, for example, a system using a semiconductor device of the same chip size, the signal capacitance value increases and thus the impedance of wiring increases. In the case where a high-frequency signal of several GHz or over is subjected to amplification in the microwave band, the high-frequency signal generally has a large amplitude. Thus, in a case where a parasitic capacitance of wiring other than that of a device can be ignored, the high-frequency signal is input in the maximum power. Therefore, there is a high possibility that the high-frequency signal will be broken due to
